Rough-and-tumble play is a natural instinct for many children. Whether it is aggressive-type play with another child or just risky play on their own, like going down the slide head first, tumbling down a hill or jumping off of haystacks, this type of play is a normal part of a child's healthy development. Also, rough-and-tumble play does not just appeal to boys.

In Embracing Rough-and-Tumble Play Mike Huber shares his commitment to allowing space for physical movement in early childhood classrooms. With the insight that comes from years of teaching, Huber argues convincingly that children need to move more often than is generally allowed, and when teachers and caregivers respect that need, children benefit socially and cognitively.

Embracing Rough-and-Tumble Play by Huber, Mike (ebook)

Rough-and-tumble play—play that involves the whole body—whether it is running, spinning, falling, or roughhousing, is the purest form of what it means to be a child.” Although often misused as a term to describe chaotic or unruly behavior, rough-and-tumble play is an important part of the development of young children.

About - Embracing Rough and Tumble Play

Embracing rough and tumble play? Isn't that the type of play I try to stop from happening in my classroom? For years I gently reminded rambunctious children: "we don't play that way inside." I often talked about teaching to the whole child but, looking back, I was ignoring many of the children's needs for physical development.

Rough-and-Tumble Play - Partnerships for Early Learners

Rough and tumble play has been defined as physically vigorous behaviors, such as chase and play fighting, that are accompanied by positive feelings between the players. Rough and tumble play allows a child to understand the limits of their own strength and discover what other children will and won't allow them to do.

Roughhousing does not turn into aggression any more than any other type of play. What is more common is a child getting a minor injury. In quality rough-housing, the other children will pause and check in with the injured child. Depending on the child, a teacher may need to help calm the child. Frequently, the child will want to join the play again after calming down.
