The present study is the first which concerns the protective effects of the flavonoid CR against DNA-damage induced by exposure of MeHg in vivo. The results give further support about the fact that CR itself does not cause adverse health effects in mammals and indicate that flavonoid may protect against DNA-damage and disturbances in redox status induced by the metal compound.

These harmful effects of RCS are mainly linked to the initiation of glycation [36, 43, 47]. Therefore, a vicious cycle can be created in vivo when RCS serve as either the initiators or products of glycation. It should be noted that reactive carbonyls are commonly generated in vivo as metabolic products [36, 44, 45, 48].
