Computers can beat humans at increasingly complex games, including chess and Go. However, these programs are typically constructed for a particular game, exploiting its properties, such as the symmetries of the board on which it is played. Silver et al. developed a program called AlphaZero, which taught itself to play Go, chess, and shogi (a Japanese version of chess) (see the Editorial, and ...

AlphaZero chess and shogi by self-play with a general reinforcement learning algorithm Silver et al., arXiv 2017. We looked at AlphaGo Zero last year (and the first generation of AlphaGo before that), but this December 2017 update is still fascinating in its own right. Recall that AlphaGo Zero learned to play Go with only knowledge of the rules and self-play.

AlphaZero shows that a single system can master three separate tasks (playing chess, shogi, and Go). However, it still approaches those tasks separately. As far as I can tell, AlphaZero does not take the knowledge it acquired through learning chess to develop a more general set of principles that it applies to shogi.

The action space for chess includes all legal destinations for all of the players' pieces on the board; shogi also allows captured pieces to be placed back on the board. Both chess and shogi may result in draws in addition to wins and losses; indeed it is believed that the optimal solution to chess is a draw [30, 20, 17].
