Modernization Theory And Economic Development

Modernization theory argues that poor nations can change their status by increasing their economic growth and adopting changes in as far as their beliefs, values and attitudes towards work are concerned. Walt Rostow's theory of economic development is a clear or perfect illustration of the modernization theory.

"Stages of Economic Growth"
Discontent In The Developing World was published in 1960, at the height of the Cold War, and with the subtitle "A Non-Communist Manifesto," it was overtly political. Rostow was fiercely anti-communist and right-wing; he modeled his theory after western capitalist countries, which had industrialized and urbanized.

Development theory -

Wikipedia

Modernization theory emerged following World War II to address the issue of how to shape the economies of states emerging from European colonization. Its implicit aim, as the subtitle of Rostow's book makes clear, was to shape the development of these countries along capitalist lines. Modernization was, thus, conceived of as the relations of production and standards of living characteristic of western Europe and the United States.

1.1 Development as modernisation and economic growth

Modernisation theory explained the underdevelopment of countries in Asia, Africa and Latin America primarily in terms of cultural 'barriers' to development', basically arguing that developing countries were underdeveloped because their traditional values held them back; other modernisation theorists focused more on economic barriers to development.
