Levallois, or more precisely the Levallois prepared-core technique, is the name archaeologists have given to a distinctive style of flint knapping, which makes up part of the Middle Paleolithic Acheulean and Mousterian artifact assemblages. In his 1969 Paleolithic stone tool taxonomy (still widely used today), Grahame Clark defined Levallois as "Mode 3", flake tools struck from prepared cores.

Each method of data display and analysis is described in detail, with practical suggestions for adaptation and use. Vivid examples from a host of disciplines show the application of qualitative research methods in real-world settings. Comprehensive coverage and a hands-on, practical approach make this a seminal treatment of the topic.
