They are sometimes said to be "timeless", "eternal", or "omnitemporal" entities. Terminology aside, the essential point is that propositions are not concrete (or material) objects. Nor, for that matter, are they mental entities; they are not "thoughts" as Frege had suggested in the nineteenth century. The theory that

It is true if the former is of the latter type. This theory, which has been developed by situation theory (e.g., Barwise and Perry, 1986), rejects the idea that correspondence is a kind of mirroring between a fact and a proposition. Rather, correspondence relations to Austin are entirely conventional.

The Greek philosopher Plato created the Theory of Forms to answer the question of reality versus concept. In his theory, all humans learn about the eternal, unchanging ideal form of something, be it an object or a concept, prior to being born. This is because there is a world of forms where every form of a thing is perfect.
