Tirra Lirra By The River

Tirra Lirra by the River brought to mind for me Moon Tiger by Penelope Lively, and Cat's Eye by Margaret Atwood. Published in 1978, Tirra Lirra is the earliest of the three, which each examine the life of a singular woman through the lens of personal recollection. Id vaguely heard of Tirra Lirra because it pops up on those lists of Best Australian Novels and had won the Miles Franklin award.

Tirra Lirra by the River. Her greatest mainstream success, however, was to come in 1978 with the publication of her fourth novel, Tirra Lirra by the River. The title is a quote from Tennyson's great ballad, “The Lady of Shalott”, which tells the tale of a female artist who meets a tragic end when she attempts to move beyond artistic isolation

Tirra Lirra by the River by Jessica Anderson ...

The reasons for the critical success and enduring popularity of Tirra Lirra by the River are not at first apparent. It is a story told by an old woman – in terms of age and gender, the least valued demographic in society – and a childless old woman at that, which pushes her even further down the totem pole of perceived social value.

Tirra Lirra by the River by Jessica Anderson ...

Tirra Lirra also appears in a poem written by Alfred Lord Tennyson in 1833 which was loosely based on the Arthurian legend of Elaine of Astolat. In the television adaptation of Lucy Maud Montgomery's Anne of Green Gables , Anne Shirley reads various stanzas of the poem and acts out the Lady of Shalott's tragic end as she floats down the river.
